Year: 1985

David Faber's nickname at CNBC is rumored to be "The Brain," and he is clearly using his. Judging by journalist history, he was an actual journalist reporting in financial news. At some point though, it looks like he was bought like Andrew Sorkin. David stopped reporting financial news with substance and started reporting financial gossip and hit pieces to confuse the public.

"They hire freelance bloggers and other amateurs to create generic, useless content and drown it out."
